

Yes, because we have a very large data set (X array) that has no noise and when each element x is evaluated it always gives the same output $f(x)$. We also see at least each element once. With this we can conclude that it is possible to construct the perfect decision tree.